

To whom it may concern...

I am greatly concerned about the current issue being talked about regarding various law enforcement agencies abilities to monitor VOIP conversations. I see no justification in being able to do this. This is a blatant disregard for the privacy of Americans.

It is the feeling of many ordinary, normal American that large government agencies are completely out of touch with how normal Americans feel, especially in issues such as this. People do not want to be fearful and worried that they may accidentally say something which will put them on some list somewhere. Information should be transfered freely without having "big brother" acting as the man in the middle.

We must be careful not to sacrifice too much liberty for the facade of "security".
